New Yorkers in different eras built different relationships with the mountains: early-nineteenth century New Yorkers remained distant from the Catskills, but used its raw materials to build the city; midcentury artists and writers such as Thomas Cole and William Cullen Bryant idealized the Catskills as their " ideal American landscape, the Edenic wilderness " (p. 74). Gilded Age entrepreneurs erected spectacular hotels overlooking sublime vistas, thus commodifying the landscape (the ...

Making Mountains is the finest modern history yet written of the Catskills—a chain of mountains that looms far larger in the national consciousness than one might think possible given their limited extent and modest height. And yet, because of the Catskills' special relationship to New York City, they became in the early nineteenth century the principal vehicle for helping Americans understand the meaning of the romantic sublime, and so shaped all subsequent American thinking about nature.
